New York City tanks could be inspected and sealed and a certificate of accuracy he issued to the dealer, but the department has never organized the work, has no help to handle the big territory, and unless motorists insist on a change nothing will ever be done to remedy conditions which are a crying shame to the largest city in the world. the largest city in the world.

the largest city in the world.

Commissioner Holwell said the only records he could obtain regarding the number of service stations and gasoline tanks were from the Bureau of Fire Prevention. These figures show approximately 1,000 storage garages and 200 exclusive service stations, which handle nothing except gasoline, oils and auto supplies, in the city. There are no other records, and no department has a count of the portable gasoline filling tanks used by many garages.

to a garage to check up pumps, and give them an official O. K. But the work is slow, and no systematic record is kept in the office, the garage man being relied upon to ask for an impection. Following the article in The Evening World yesterday many requests for inspection were made, the telephone in the office of Commissioner Colwell being kept busy all afternoon. Fearing a visit by inspectors in the next few days due to the disclosures of The Evening World, many garage men and service station proprietors asked to have their pumps checked up in advance.

Talks with garage men show the loss in gasoline hills by owners of large cars is tremendous. An example was given of a resident of West End Avenue who owns three cars. The chauffeur keeps he machines in a garage, and buys gasoline there, being rated a "good fellow." The owner is charged with ten gallons of gas, but only five are put in the tank the servare man, "solit.
